Sunken battleship yields shells and artifacts

SAVANNAH, Ga. — (UPI) — The first recovery of a Civil War-era shipwreck has yielded more than 1,000 shells and artifacts from the Savannah River, the next step in the investigation, according to a Texas archaeologist.

“The only issue is to turn the river off. That means some sort of containment structure has to be in place,” said the state’s chief of divers, the Connecticut-based salvors. “The last thing we want to do is to damage the river.”

Garrett said the recovery team would attempt to preserve the artifacts found in the water, but that it would be difficult to do so without damaging the river. He said the team would also try to determine whether the wreck could withstand the current conditions.

Civil War ship awaits divers

SAVANNAH, Ga. — The Civil War shipwreck of the CSS Georgia is set to be salvaged this week. The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

The vessel lies in the mud off Fort Jackson, and the crew of the Confederate Navy has been working on the vessel for the past several weeks.

A team of divers will spend the next five or six weeks at the site, working on the vessel, and then the vessel will be moved to a location where it can be salvaged. The vessel will then be moved to a location near the mouth of the river, and then it will be moved to a location in the Savannah Harbor.

The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

Civil War ship awaits divers

SAVANNAH, Ga. — The Civil War shipwreck of the CSS Georgia is set to be salvaged this week. The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

The vessel lies in the mud off Fort Jackson, and the crew of the Confederate Navy has been working on the vessel for the past several weeks.

A team of divers will spend the next five or six weeks at the site, working on the vessel, and then the vessel will be moved to a location where it can be salvaged. The vessel will then be moved to a location near the mouth of the river, and then it will be moved to a location in the Savannah Harbor.

The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

Civil War ship awaits divers

SAVANNAH, Ga. — The Civil War shipwreck of the CSS Georgia is set to be salvaged this week. The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

The vessel lies in the mud off Fort Jackson, and the crew of the Confederate Navy has been working on the vessel for the past several weeks.

A team of divers will spend the next five or six weeks at the site, working on the vessel, and then the vessel will be moved to a location where it can be salvaged. The vessel will then be moved to a location near the mouth of the river, and then it will be moved to a location in the Savannah Harbor.

The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

Civil War ship awaits divers

SAVANNAH, Ga. — The Civil War shipwreck of the CSS Georgia is set to be salvaged this week. The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

The vessel lies in the mud off Fort Jackson, and the crew of the Confederate Navy has been working on the vessel for the past several weeks.

A team of divers will spend the next five or six weeks at the site, working on the vessel, and then the vessel will be moved to a location where it can be salvaged. The vessel will then be moved to a location near the mouth of the river, and then it will be moved to a location in the Savannah Harbor.

The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

Civil War ship awaits divers

SAVANNAH, Ga. — The Civil War shipwreck of the CSS Georgia is set to be salvaged this week. The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

The vessel lies in the mud off Fort Jackson, and the crew of the Confederate Navy has been working on the vessel for the past several weeks.

A team of divers will spend the next five or six weeks at the site, working on the vessel, and then the vessel will be moved to a location where it can be salvaged. The vessel will then be moved to a location near the mouth of the river, and then it will be moved to a location in the Savannah Harbor.

The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

Civil War ship awaits divers

SAVANNAH, Ga. — The Civil War shipwreck of the CSS Georgia is set to be salvaged this week. The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

The vessel lies in the mud off Fort Jackson, and the crew of the Confederate Navy has been working on the vessel for the past several weeks.

A team of divers will spend the next five or six weeks at the site, working on the vessel, and then the vessel will be moved to a location where it can be salvaged. The vessel will then be moved to a location near the mouth of the river, and then it will be moved to a location in the Savannah Harbor.

The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

Civil War ship awaits divers

SAVANNAH, Ga. — The Civil War shipwreck of the CSS Georgia is set to be salvaged this week. The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.

The vessel lies in the mud off Fort Jackson, and the crew of the Confederate Navy has been working on the vessel for the past several weeks.

A team of divers will spend the next five or six weeks at the site, working on the vessel, and then the vessel will be moved to a location where it can be salvaged. The vessel will then be moved to a location near the mouth of the river, and then it will be moved to a location in the Savannah Harbor.

The vessel was one of the first to be salvaged from the Savannah River, and the next step in the investigation has been to recover the vessel lost in the Civil War.